THE MAKING OF THE AMERICANS

Foreword

NOW 'there is no such thing as repetition' in The Making of Americans, because I deleted it. Herein, every word and punctuation mark is retained according to its first (and hence last) appearance in Gertrude Stein's 925-page edition of the book.

HOLLY MELGARD

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS

Once an angry man dragged his father along the ground through own orchard. “Stop!” cried groaning old at last, I did not drag my beyond this tree

It is hard living down tempers we are born with all begin well for in our youth there nothing more intolerant of than sins writ large others and fight them fiercely ourselves; but grow see that these really harmless ones to nay they give a charm any character so struggle dies away has always seemed me rare privilege being American real one whose tradition taken scarcely sixty years create need only realise parents remember grandparents know history complete people new world made out story mean tell what Some fathers must can were little boys then came across water their just mothers even women young grandmothers perhaps have seen carried into inside those strong bear looked very weak many children certain men grandfathers unborn gone ahead prepare home countries full who brought had make generations will fill up us family its progress kinds was she lead suffer gentle weary woman after would sadly weeping sadness sinning wearying rest knew her death bring sweet good died left do four husbands Other different times poor things never found how could dreamed while fought way help went pieces thought rose greatness first mostly saw each grandchildren later wandering over land where seeking either rich or gain wisdom met another married together now soon be watching When such feeling think back beginning as grown feel lives been thinking sometimes talk
